Between 2019 and 2022 the military and the UK parliament collaborated in 'combating Covid19 disinformation'. In this months psychobabble analysis, we examine the classic 'tell' exhibited by government bureaucrats and 'militarised' agencies. The commitment to avoid large scale mechanised warfare has resulted in a blatant assault on well-being. Instead of redistributing wealth through major loss of life, the war machine has been re-tasked to reduce quality of life using the most profitable methods.

Government Military Industrial Complex Conspiracy Technology Psychology Corona Virus Britain Secret Space Fleet Secret Societies Social Engineering Covid Delayed Corruption

In the TEFLONRABBIT article The Secret Space Fleet - Or is it? we covered the work of John Lenard Walson. In a nutshell he used a camera and a telescope to capture footage and images of enormous infrastructure in low earth orbit. While many have written off his work as a hoax, there remains the somewhat compelling images of the subsequent aerial flybys he received from military helicopters. These are less easy to debunk as the meanderings of some crank indulging his sci-fi fantasies, out in the sticks. Consequently they reaffirm the inelegant truth that if he were some tinfoil hat incompetent, why would the military bother sending a black Chinook and a gunship to intimidate him? It simply does not make sense. These vehicles are notoriously expensive to operate and Walson has had multiple encounters with them. The uncompromising nature of a letter he received from The Institute of Astronomy appears highly credible and names MIT Lincoln Laboratory as the manufacturers:

> Much of what they do is what used to be the Star wars project, which no doubt involves some of your objects.

The gravity of this frank admission can not be overstated. Who paid for these projects and what are they for? SDI was supposed to be conceptual and cancelled. Did it in fact simply go dark and end up being constructed by private interests while being financed by the DoD? There are literally dozens of questions which arise from a single point of security failure. Had the commander of Walsons local military base belayed the order to send the fright squad over to buzz his house, nobody would have given it a second glance. But they did give the order, the flights were made and as a result, many exopolitics enthusiasts saw the footage complete with fright squad imagery and their eyebrows were fairly raised. This could be a highly complex triple bluff in order to leak information and justify external investigation of whistleblowers, but it seems unlikely. More likely it's a knee jerk reaction intended to deter Walson from ever releasing more footage. However it's the ultimate double edged sword. What is intended as a dominant and discouraging tactic results in an egregious, high profile failure in containment and strategic security application.

The appearance of a fatigues wearing Brigadier next to Boris Johnson during the incessant Covid19 briefings also raised a few eyebrows. Especially when it was announced that he represented the 77th Brigade. While unknown to most, anyone familiar with arguing the toss on social media knew of the 77th Brigade from their somewhat paltry attempts at narrative enforcement. In the words of David Miller, a professor of political sociology at the University of Bristol, they are;

> Involved in manipulation of the media including using fake online profiles.

Once again, the logical question would be the most illuminating; Why are media manipulating military personnel working with the government to deliver the Covid19 information? Surely if it's everything that the NHS claimed it to be, everyone would know how serious it was and that would be enough. These questions were rebutted with bland statements along the lines of 'combating disinformation from outside of the UK' and of course 'no military personnel were involved in stifling free and open discourse in Britain'. Because obviously that's the type of thing that happens in far away places that require regime change in order to enjoy freedom like we do in ye good ole Blighty. This was even more propaganda intended to protect the propaganda machine and it stuck out like a naked man with his hair on fire. Which is about as far from covert as it gets.

In order to understand this consistent failure in terms of rational containment, we need to once again look into the past in order to understand the present. The use of intimidation tactics to suppress contradictory resistance is nothing new. In the article Cisnormativity, Cisgender privilege & all out Terf wars we covered the evolution of psycho-sexual weaponised disinformation. This has been in many ways an inevitable byproduct of a method employed in antiquity to control detachments of standing armies, either deployed or garrisoned. The existence of homosexuality in Greco-Roman military forces was ruthlessly co-opted by the hierarchy as a control method. It was blatantly encouraged by certain military groups as representing the most effective paired combat units. The majority of military bodies have historically taken a hard line on same sex relationships with some advocating punishment and in hard line religious cultures, even death. Nonetheless, in terms of control it has provided leverage, which is more far useful than bromide or grog in terms of preventing mutiny and insurrection. Today we see a schism between the interests which have evolved to normalise homosexuality (and thus counter the leverage) and those who cling on to the discriminatory and demonised stigma specifically for the purposes of leverage. Due to the inherent application of perception management, a bizarre scenario has come about where increasing numbers of individuals falsify their homosexuality to present a false weakness which can then be used as leverage by those whom they serve. This clearly flies in the face of any gay rights activity and fairly spits on the grave of those who faced death for their proclivities. As such it massively dilutes the stigma, negates the leverage and consequently threatens the control structure.

The entirety of WW2 was replete with slogans and media campaigns designed to stamp out the ever looming spectre of conscientious objection. Wives and mothers were taught to consider the loss of their husbands and sons as an honour. These men had given their lives in defence of the British ideal and this should never be considered to be a negative. Mainly because British men are more scared of their women than they are of the government or the enemy. Were their wives to vehemently object to them signing up as volunteers or being drafted, the military would consist of career officers and a few sadistic berserkers. This obviously represents a completely unworkable situation for the Ministry of Defence and their international equivalents. This was part of a sustained propaganda effort which continued for forty years after the war and fueled much of the public support for the Cold War. With the fostering of agreements such as the Warsaw Pact and NATO, such single state orientated propaganda became less relevant. Consequently the propaganda machines of globalist interest groups shifted their focus to a form of distributed xenophobia which is based more on race, creed and colour than in fervent patriotism. This is not always in line with the geopolitical and economic interests of member states who have periodically waxed and waned in their support for such projects as The Kalergi Plan. This type of disparity between interests is what lead directly to the U.S internment policies enacted in the 1940's. Policies which are still bitterly remembered today by many who would otherwise potentially consider military careers. Another instance of the militarised, political control system shooting itself directly in the wallet.

Far from being a 20th century phenomenon this mentality has existed for longer than records have been kept. To rationalise it's purpose we can consider that the governments of most countries are considerably more invested in domestic militarised intelligence gathering than they would ever care to admit. Hollywood and the global multimedia industry has made literally millions of hours worth of content on this very subject. Video games, albums and even clothing have been influenced by the clandestine world and it's obsession with the covert. All very entertaining until one looks at quite how pervasive the influence has become. When schools start running feeder courses to prepare teenagers to become civil servants, the implications in terms of covert operations start to look more like the sinister machinations of a Balkanised state. Historically speaking very few people choose to be governed by the puppets of an occupying superpower. Their standing armies generally have to be conscripted and do not represent the highest calibre candidates.

The so called 'rise' of the snitch nation is a crass and blatant understatement in terms of chronology. As has been covered in articles such as Profiles of incompetence, the density of informants has reached such ludicrous levels that there are now more grasses than people to grass up. However this isn't a new thing. It's been on the rise for millennia and periodically goes through phases of accelerated growth. The philosophy has become one of using every facet of life to acquire a dopamine release based on information dominance. In centuries past this was the remit of secret societies and commercially successful guild members. Gradually it absorbed property vendors, merchants, council members, magistrates and politicians. It's since mushroomed to encompass the police, teachers, nurses, bin men, shopkeepers, street sweepers, publicans, sales advisors, checkout staff, the unemployed, students, junkies and basically every other demographic in society. As time has progressed, the ages of the prospective informant has gradually lowered until the acquisition of new assets becomes a futures market. The informants of tomorrow are prepared today, even if they haven't been conceived yet.

The final quality of individual assets becomes of such little importance that even the process of training them is replaced by the economics of market share. Nobody cares how high the levels of quality assurance are, all they want is more. The application of savage capitalism to human resource management fails in its basic premise, human beings are not a consistently predictable commodity. Trading in the future of peoples lives can only ever be considered as a best effort estimate. There is no way to guarantee the outcome of a product which is the cumulative result of millions of individual and random variables. As a result of this inherently incorrect philosophy failing on an ongoing basis, the desired outcome is altered in an attempt to co-opt the disparity. The failure of the industry to create consistently valuable products is irrelevant to those who trade in the future industry markets. They simply fudge the desired outcome and pretend that it still has value. Due to the entire industry being predicated on deception in the first place, self delusion is an unavoidable consequence. Those who invest in acquiring the rights to manipulate peoples lives will always claim that any outcome was (and still is) in their interests. This blatant lack of pragmatism only survives because everything about the industry is based on illusion. The rules are made up to suit the desired outcome, consequently it doesn't matter whether anyone actually follows them or not. It's the equivalent of gambling with counterfeit money, it doesn't actually matter how much is won or lost. That's about as far from systems critical as it's possible to get.

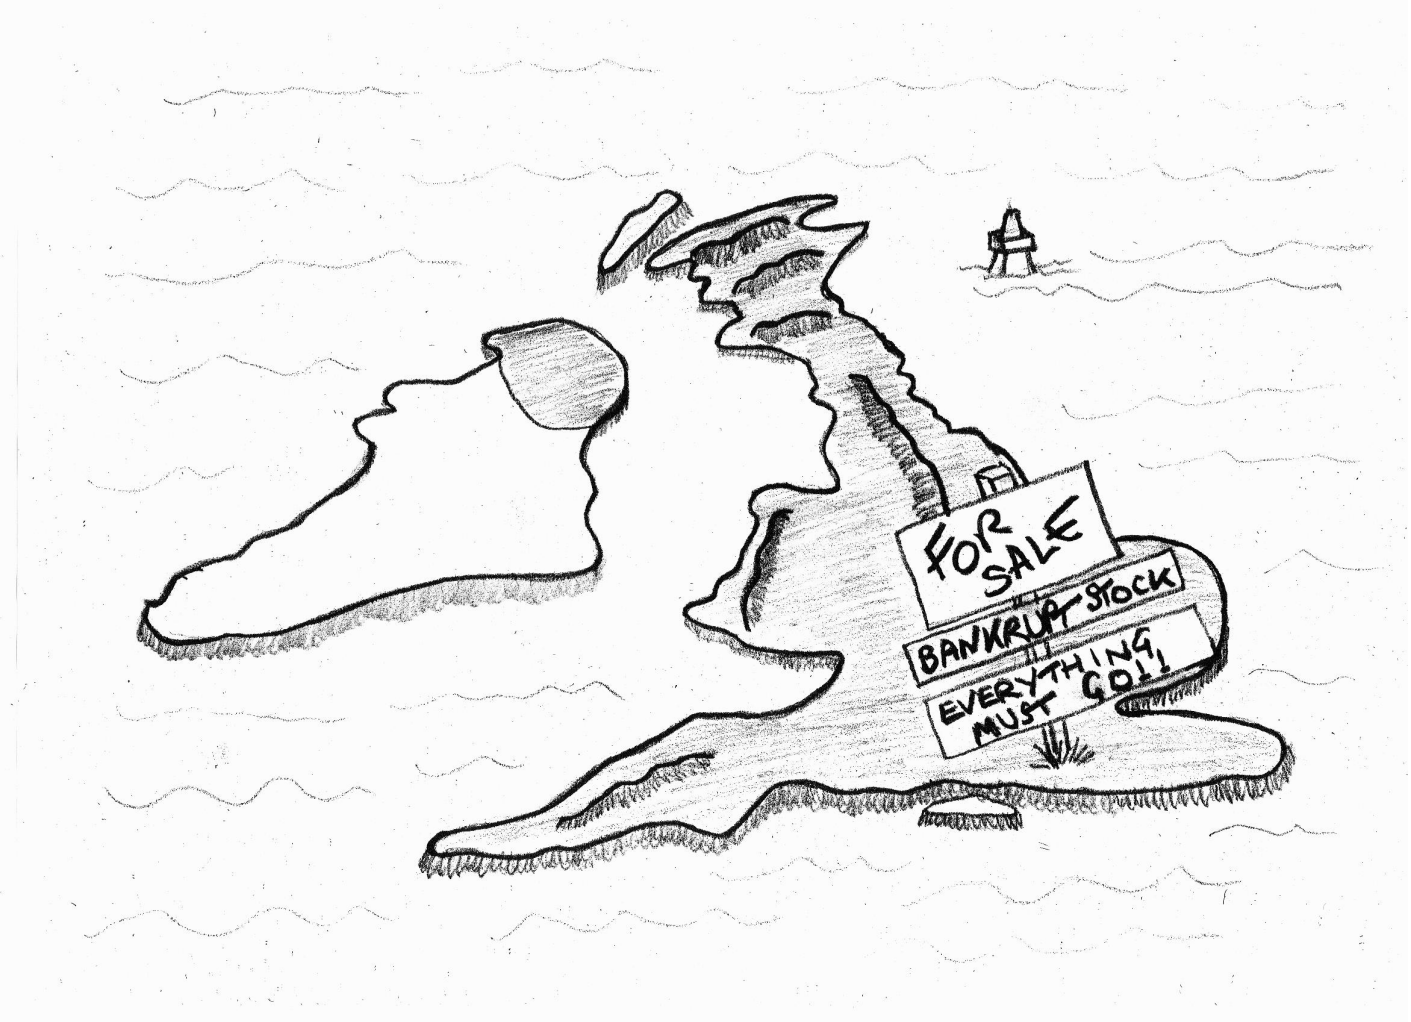

The erroneous element of this mentality can be expressed as a classic failure in economic strategy. As discussed in the articles High octane emotional energy and Systems critical application or how not to plough it, focusing on growth as opposed to quality of output always results in a reduction in gain. It may produce short term boom-town results which appear sustainable over a lifetime or two, but invariably the unavoidable crash leads to considerable losses. This is the default state of the financial industry and has been accepted as such for many decades. However when this mentality is translated into the human resource landscape, any concept of humanity, compassion or empathy goes straight down the toilet. This is not considered as being particularly relevant to groups that value material gain over societal well-being. However when the gains are dependent on a continuous and predictable influx of new human resources, societal well-being is actually critically important. Therefore any organisation claiming to use strategies that are comparable with military methods (yet still exhibit such erroneous economic thinking) are clearly quite negligent in their duty.

The work of Miles Johnson and the Bases Project has focused on individuals claiming to have been so called 'Super Soldiers'. For the most part these people display such pronounced schizoid behaviour that they are written off as the mentally ill. Johnson has come under criticism for ruthlessly mining their illness for his own gain, yet still continues unabated. It is reasonable to consider many of his interviewees as indeed displaying traits of mental illness, but that doesn't mean that everything they have to say should automatically be discounted. Clandestine organisations have always used such traits (and the perception of such traits) to obfuscate their assets. The masterless Ronin of ancient Japan were known for disguising themselves as crazy men for years while they plotted their revenge. The fictional works of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle regularly feature Holmes impersonating a deranged vagrant while conducting his investigations. If a clandestine group wants a convenient outlet for the communication of their insane horseshit or backstabbing, double crossing espionage, who better than an awkward and disjointed person?

Our regular hypothetical person who we shall once again call Mr. X is ranting on about fluoride on the high street. Due to his appearance and lack of conventional body language, he looks like he's clearly insane. There is however, substantial evidence to indicate that the use of fluoride in water has less to do with the preservation of dental integrity than with creating an ongoing threat to the health of the population. Influencing Mr X. into babbling about it outside the cornershop represents an opportunity for veiled communication. Some of his confused babble has been programmed into his psyche using methods such as Neuro Linguistic Programming or ELF-INT as an encrypted message for decryption by those who have the cipher. Most of the people passing by do not have this cipher and as such it's interpreted as the rantings of some dishevelled tinfoil hat conspiritard. Mr. X is then blatantly marginalised and ignored as the rambling whacko that he so clearly represents. Unfortunately the anti fluoride fixated Mr. X generally doesn't know that he's being used as the equivalent of a walking dead letter box. Therefore it's entirely possible that he may not go to the cornershop that day and may instead decide (or be influenced into) standing outside the hairdressers and preaching vociferously about the length of mens beards. While the subject of mens beards may attract listeners, it isn't what the cipher carrying recipients are looking for, whether they know it or not. The potential for him derailing the required communication is substantial. This means that an otherwise unaccountable method can be subverted by numerous external forces and as such can not be considered in any way whatsoever a systems critical application. Again, any group claiming to use military strategies who then implement such a fragile and unreliable method are quite profoundly negligent in terms of due dilligence. In a systems critical environment with enlisted personnel this would be rightfully considered gross dereliction of duty and would result in investigation, punitive measures and possibly even court martial.

The inexplicably ill conceived increase in the number of so called RIPA agencies in Britain has thrust a substantial percentage of the population into situations not unlike the fluoride / Mr. X narrative. This means that visitors to this country who are not aux fais with these utterly bizarre methods are in danger of perceiving Britain to be a nation of deranged fools. While this may suit such supranational plutocrats such as Bill Gates, George Soros and Klaus Schwab, it's not the type of image that Winston Churchill, the Duke of Wellington or Admiral Nelson would care to see debase this once mighty superpower. Consequently it behooves every conscientious Briton to denounce this sickening malaise. We must ensure that we do not allow these so called 'agencies' to compel anyone else into talking absolute shit in the high street, the pub, the library or even the public cafe in the palace of Westminster. Irrespective of the serious damage to Britains credibility, the vast majority of this behaviour isn't even commercially viable. It exists purely to please some faceless bureaucrat in Whitehall, Millbank or St. Georges. This country faces grave peril from a mindset which originates thousands (at least) of miles away. We must act now before the future of our nation is stolen from under our very noses by forces who care nothing for the tea drinking, biscuit dunking civility of British life.

Whilst the tone of this article may occasionally imply somewhat frivolous analysis or even alarmism, the world as we knew it has changed irrevocably. Eighteen months ago, a search for 'Covid delayed' produced less than a handful of results. Now there are dozens of results, including academic papers. Things are accelerating toward an indeterminable end point and we are heading into a conspicuously bleak future that can not be considered too lightly. Things got this bad by everyone going along to get along. Those seeking to protect a way of life that they are actually entitled to, have been conned into believing that they must 'earn' the trappings of consumerism. This con only works while the population submit to a jackboot of tyranny which exists purely to subjugate. Those who have been conned into doing the bidding of these mediocre clandestine tyrants have had their value systems altered and live in perpetual fear. If we allow this to continue, the only winners will be the insidious malefactors who have positioned themselves as supranational despots.
